Planning a Mural

The students in the art club were making plans. They wanted to paint a mural on the outside of the town's recycling center. Their teacher offered to help them write a letter. The letter would describe the plans for the mural. It would ask for permission to paint. The students would ask people in town to sign the letter. If enough people signed, the students would take it to Town Hall.

The students had begun to argue over ideas for the mural. They had very different ideas. Sammy hoped to paint a picture of the town.

Jessie wanted to show a rainy day and a sunny day. Anita just wanted to paint ponies.

Anita loved ponies! But Luis's choice was the winner.

Everyone agreed it was the perfect idea. Their mural at the recycling center would show people recycling!

The Bigfoot Mural

Duane Flatmo is a mural artist who lives in California. Duane has covered the walls of many dull buildings with eye-catching paintings.

One of Duane's biggest paintings is on the outside of a hardware store. The owner of the store has always liked Duane's art. When he built the store, he left space for a mural on an outside wall.

Duane used the wall to paint a Bigfoot mural. Bigfoot is a tall, hairy creature. Many people say he isn't real, though there are many stories about him. People in the town with the store often claim that Bigfoot lives nearby.

The mural shows Bigfoot helping a building crew. This makes sense on a store that sells hardware! Whatever you think about Bigfoot, you will probably enjoy this big art!

Backyard Crocodile Relatives

Reed had just learned that crocodiles were relatives of dinosaurs. He told his dad about it as Dad served pancakes.

"That's great," said Dad. He grinned. "Later, let's look for more crocodile relatives in our backyard!"

Reed glanced outside. Two blackbirds pecked at grain in the bird feeder.

Reed felt uneasy. "What crocodile relatives would be in our backyard?" he asked. He began to fear what his dad would say. What was Dad talking about?

A dove landed on the bird feeder.

"There's another one," said Dad. "I've now seen three crocodile relatives today." Dad smiled at his son's blank look. "The closest living relatives of crocodiles and alligators are birds!" he explained.

"I didn't know that," said Reed. He felt relief. "I'm glad they eat grain, not people!"

Crocodiles: The Cousins of Dinosaurs

Dinosaurs died out about 65 million years ago. But some animals that were cousins to the dinosaurs are still around today. These dinosaur cousins are the crocodiles.

In 2009, scientists found the fossils of some very old crocodiles. These ancient crocodiles lived 100 million years ago. They were not exactly the same as crocodiles today. But they were close.

The fossils showed scientists that there were different kinds of ancient crocodiles. Crocodiles the size of dogs ate plants and grubs. Others were twenty feet long and had three rows of teeth. These toothy crocodiles even ate dinosaurs!

Today's crocodiles live in many different parts of the world. It does not take much effort to picture them among those long-gone dinosaurs. Unlike dinosaurs, though, these creatures are still around.
